Tamara Diaz
the magical healing of art
by Monsurat Ottun / Reza Corinne Clifton

Like the colors and images found in her cover art piece, “Magic Mamas,” Tamara Diaz has a lot of different influences and experiences that have painted her life. Today, she uses art in her work as a clinical therapist. Diaz recently won the Extraordinary Woman’s Award for Cultural Enrichment as part of the Until the Violence STOPS: Rhode Island festival. Diaz is “very passionate about documentary, photography and seeing how different cultures and classes live, both here and in other countries.” She is inspired, in part by her mother’s family, who were Holocaust survivors, from her childhood and adolescence in Barcelona, Spain and New York City, and from backpacking trips through Mexico, Central America and Europe. Diaz dreams of one day traveling to her father’s homeland of Cuba, which today remains restricted for American citizens. To see more of her artwork, visit www.lovethyjob.com/TamaraDiaz.

“After college, I began working at the Rape Crisis Center and at a group home for teenage girls. I continued to get my Masters of Social Work, and then my Independent License, which was a good move since there are many Spanish-speaking people who need help, and not so many Spanish-speaking clinicians. At my full time job, I do home visits all over Rhode Island and work on the Bilingual team. I also work out of the office and work primarily with Latino clients doing therapy to address mental health issues, behavior and emotional issues and trauma. I am very passionate about my work and feel blessed to be able to help others.”

The room was humming with voices and filled with a variety of colors – as you would expect at a conference that’s attracted hundreds. But as introductions began and the next speaker took the stage, the crowd became quiet; I was in the audience that day, among those who became transfixed. It was January 28, 2010, and it was the annual Health Action “Grassroots” Conference held by the national health advocacy organization, Families USA.

In a demeanor completely absent of histrionics, Congresswoman Donna Edwards, a Representative from Maryland, told the audience her own health story. It is one that starts with a career shift and corresponding inability to pay for COBRA, the temporary health insurance provided by certain employers after a person has lost his or her job. While able to acquire insurance for her son, “I crossed my fingers,” she says as what she chose for herself. Eventually she felt sick; in fact “sicker and sicker,” she recalled, until the day she passed out at a grocery store to then be rushed to the Emergency Room.

In some ways she was lucky, she describes, because there was no withholding of treatment in relation to her insurance status. But that luck would soon run out as thousands of dollars in hospital bills arrived, followed by debates about which bills to pay and, eventually, the foreclosure notices. “My personal experience shows,” concludes Edwards, “what we might have today, we might not have tomorrow.” Or the day after that, as was clear from her journey to medical and financial recovery represented in her visible presence and stature that day.

Later in the conference, during a presentation I gave on how to spread the message on “advancing health equity,” I reminded the group about Congresswoman Edwards’ remarks, and what it meant in the context of my presentation. I inform them about how unlikely it was for the Congresswoman’s story to be heard on an even larger scale due to the underrepresentation of women and people of color on influential media programming, such as Sunday morning political talk shows on TV. Even the growing interest in President Obama and the First Lady has not curbed what one research group (Media Matters for America) calls this “overwhelmingly white and overwhelmingly male” trend.

Women and people of color: We have to tell our own stories. That is why we took the time in this issue to connect with a variety of community health workers, a trusted health reporter, and those working closely in neighborhoods and community centers. They have their own stories or know the heartbreaking version of others, and it informs and inspires their work. We pay a tribute to these women, as well as to a fallen friend, Dana Wright, who may have left this world, but who in life left her mark.

more than able to make Rhode Island healthier advocates, Aleatha Dickerson and Dana Wright

by Reza Corinne Clifton

In 2008 and 2009, writer and community activist, Dana Wright, wrote instructive and engaging articles for She Shines’ Minority Health editions. Her intellect, curiosity and sense of humanity were palpable in each word she delivered and in each question she answered in print, making her contributions not only important but also accessible and engaging. Therefore, it was with sadness and a sense of the magnanimous loss that we received the news in December 2009 – of Wright’s premature passing. Signaling what could have been the end of an era, here at She Shines we decided to continue with her fight in the field of disability awareness, inclusive representation and equal rights for all.

The question of how to do this did not linger for long thanks to a diverse group of individuals who work with the Rhode Island Department of Health (HEALTH). The Minority Health Advisory Committee (MHAC) is a group originally formed after the creation of HEALTH’s Office of Minority Health, according to Aleatha Dickerson, one of the co-chairs of MHAC. Their work is “about what they can do to improve things for minorities,” she says, “because of documented cases of disparities.”

Dickerson’s value to the group is clear. As a former pathology technologist at a blood bank, Dickerson has an insider’s view of what the various steps in healthcare delivery look like. She also knows what it’s like to represent and build with an underserved community. As an active member of the Chappaquiddick Wampanoags, a Native American tribe part of the regional “Wampanoag Nation,” and as a graduate student, says Dickerson, “I did bring information and set up at a lot of the different Pow Wow’s.” She earned a Master’s degree from the University of Rhode Island in 2001.

But Dickerson also knows what it’s like to be your own advocate. After experiencing a near-fatal allergic reaction in 1987, Stevens-Johnson Syndrome, Dickerson lost most of her sight, ultimately ending up blind. “It was traumatic and life-changing,” says Dickerson, and not just due to her vision problems. She ended up in intensive care then a burn unit, “because my skin was burned,” she explains. “I also had a lot of scarring in the eyes, and that was very painful.”

You would not know it today if you were at a meeting with her or conversing over the phone, but it took Dickerson 5-6 months after being released from the hospital before she sought help for “mobility training” and “daily living” skills. “They say you go through a grieving process,” said Dickerson during the interview. “I got through it with the support of my husband and family.” She and her husband have one daughter and three sons; at the time, their oldest child was 13 and their youngest was 8. “I wanted to step back into the role of mom,” she explains.

Dickerson lives in Providence, where she also raised her children. She credits the “ethnic diversity” in her neighborhood as one of the factors that helped her children adjust to changes in their mother. She also says she “exposed” her children “to people with a variety of disabilities.” Dickerson did this by regularly taking them with her when she had appointments at “independent living centers.” But she also credits Wright.

“Dana grew up with my children,” says Dickerson. “She was part of the kids in the neighborhood and they included her. They respected her for who she was.” Reflecting further she says, “They really looked up to her.”

Still affected by Wright’s departure, yet impressed by both women’s unyielding willingness to stand and advocate for themselves and others, She Shines sends a tribute and thanks to both the fallen Dana Wright and the powerful Aleatha Dickerson. They both show that, not only is life beyond a disability possible, but so is a life dedicated to making way for a healthier Rhode Island overall.

Aleatha Dickerson is co-chair of the Minority Health Advisory Committee. To learn more, contact the Office of Minority Health at 222-2901. Organizations Dickerson utilizes for services, referrals, or in-home services include: Ocean State Center for Independent Living, www.oscil.org; The Rhode Island Indian Council, www.rhodeislandindiancouncil.org; and Rhode Island Services for the Blind and Visually Impaired, 421-7005, 421-7016 (TDD), 272-8090 (Spanish). She also recommends the state’s Office of Rehabilitative Services for people with disabilities looking for vocational programs and job-related opportunities, www.ors.state.ri.us.
After more than 25 years since the AIDS virus became known worldwide, it continues to threaten the health and well-being of many in the United States. In the Latino community, many believe that HIV/AIDS is one of the most urgent health problems facing the nation today.

According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the rate of new HIV infections among Hispanics/Latinos was 2.5 times higher than that of whites and 17% of all new HIV infections occurring in the United States in the year 2006. For women, it’s especially worrying. According to the federal Office of Minority Health (OMH), “Hispanic females are almost five times as likely to have AIDS in 2006 as white females.”

As their evidence shows, there is a problem that’s been developing for years. Yet resources for HIV care and prevention have not kept pace with the disease’s ravaging effect on Latinos and, for example, African Americans – who accounted for almost half of all HIV/AIDS cases in 2007 according to OMH researchers. This mismatch, between the scope of the problem and the impact of funding, has affected prevention and care – important tools to reducing the problem and the impact of fund- ing free medical and preventive health services.

Velazquez has also applied her expertise to the area of HIV/AIDS. She is a strong advocate for educating people and providing resources for testing and, therefore, early detection of HIV. Velazquez says there is an overwhelming amount of studies on HIV/AIDS, but Latinos usually learn they have the disease when it is full blown AIDS. In her mind, then, the studies do not serve their purpose if they do not reach those who might get infected, educate those who are already suffering from it and prompt regular testing.

Another one of her contributions has been bringing together various agencies that provide HIV/AIDS services to work together, to fight existing and persisting stigmas – the myths, fears, misunderstandings and false information frequently shared on the topic. One strategy she notes is investing in and partnering with organizations beyond HIV/AIDS providers and health departments, for example corporate, media, and faith-based entities and others. She also says HIV/AIDS stigma must be addressed through the development and launch of social marketing campaigns targeting Latinos and Latino-specific factors and complemented by anti-stigma, community-based interventions. This has prompted Velazquez to work in several capacities together with agencies such as Progreso Latino, Rhode Island Red Cross and the Center for Substance Abuse.

“I want to make others aware that we have to eliminate the stigma of this disease, especially in our Latino communities,” says Velazquez, where “still in the 21st Century, many families don’t talk about sex.” She says it’s either because they feel ashamed or because they believe it’s a conversation strictly for the bedroom.

But Velazquez is talking, and she doesn’t plan to stop. “Health saved my life” and in return, she says, “I’ll be the voice for those who otherwise cannot advocate for themselves.”

Keeping Rhode Islanders Healthy
One Newscast at a Time
Issues Dear to Barbara Morse Silva’s Heart

by Raymonde M. Charles

Many in the medical field and larger Rhode Island community believe that Barbara Morse Silva, as health reporter for NBC 10, is also a registered nurse. Several years ago, Silva was to give a speech at a local hospital and was introduced as “Barbara Morse, RN.” Taking it all in stride, Silva joked that the “RN” in this case stood for “respected news person.”

Silva has been a journalist for about 30 years and is a three-time Emmy Award nominee. She started her career in journalism as an intern on radio then on television, and has worked as a reporter in Hawaii, Arizona, Illinois and Massachusetts. She came to Rhode Island from WISH-TV in Indianapolis, where prior to becoming a reporter, she was an on-air intern at the station. It was “back when they let interns on the air,” she recalls.

“Joining NBC 10” and covering health “is one of those accidental good things that happened to me,” said Silva. “When I was asked to become the health reporter at NBC 10, I said sure, I have enough health elements.” Silva brought more than her professionalism, talent and passion to the field of health reporting when joining the station in 1995; she has her own diagnoses of asthma and allergies.

With each newscast, Silva’s goal is to empower men and women to take charge of their health by providing them with pertinent facts and updates. Silva said, “I feel like I am the clearinghouse for a lot of information; I throw things out there about diseases and treatments. Mind you, I never endorse any treatment or any new products or anything. I just simply let people know what is available.” She also helps to clarify myths and misconceptions.

“Women think that breast cancer is the biggest threat to their health but heart disease,” says Silva “is the number one killer of women in the U.S.” And the symptoms can be different between men and women. “Women,” reports Silva, “may not get the crushing chest pain when they are having a heart attack. They might get jaw pain or pain in the shoulder or in the upper back, or they might feel nauseous.”

Some of Silva’s “Health Check” reports hit even closer to home. “Anytime I do stories on asthma, allergies, diabetes and mental health it is personal to me,” says Silva. “While I do not have diabetes my dad does, which puts me at higher risk.” In addition, she shares, “News stories on mental health issues are also near and dear to my heart because my mother had a bipolar disorder.” Silva says her mother died as a result of her mental illness.

“Thankfully, these days they know how to diagnosis it. However, she was misdiagnosed [back then]. She was diagnosed as having chronic depression, but they did not see the manic side of her.” Silva is encouraged that medical advances in the field of mental health have improved the diagnosis and treatment of mental illnesses; however, she continues to be concerned about the lack of access to mental health services.

Silva is concerned about health access in general, and about the difficulties minorities and the uninsured face in receiving health care. She says she has talked to many viewers who said they were denied medical tests because they did not have health insurance, and says what does exist is “a fragmented health care system.”

“The system does not provide fair and equal access and treatment to all,” declares Silva, which is why “health care reform is needed.” But first, she says, “we need to fix the existing system [because] it is hard to reform something that is broken. Instead of putting on a Band-aid, we need to dig deep and fix the broken system and then reform it.”

In addition to broadening access to care, Silva hopes that changes in the health care system will improve doctor-patient relations. She points to research on provider biases as helpful tools for educating physicians and patients on their subconscious views and prejudices, and says these revelations can improve the identification and treatment of illnesses in people of all races and nationalities.

Silva is on a mission to help people enjoy healthier lives. She encourages people to engage and participate in their health care, and urges her viewers to be more than just passive recipients of care. Referring back to heart disease, Silva says women should know what a heart attack looks like or feels like in a woman, and they should be “active” and “proactive” in their health. To all her viewers she advises: “be the best advocate for your health” because “you know your body better than anyone else.”

“You should go to your doctor’s appointments with a list of questions,” she advises, and “if you are not happy with what you are hearing, you should seek a second opinion. Your life may be on the line,” says Silva, “do not worry about hurting anyone’s feelings.”

Silva says we all have “gut feelings” that tell us when “something is not right here,” and she says we should listen to them. But more than that, remarks Silva, “I want to help motivate people to have regular doctor’s visits, to exercise and to eat healthier and smaller portions.”

“I am touched even if [only] one person calls to say, ‘oh my God, the light bulb went off [after watching a Health Check report],’” says Silva, “I researched it more and talked to my doctor and that is what I have.”

Kormasa Traub observes a growing interest in health

by Margaret E. Thomas

To anyone who knows Kormasa Traub’s background it is not a surprise that she is interested in health issues, and in the health of the African community in Rhode Island in particular. According to Traub, she comes from a “family of nurses.” You see, her mother is a nurse practitioner, an aunt is a nurse, her father works in a hospital, and her sister is soon to be a pharmacist.

She is also the daughter of Liberian immigrants, and a first generation American raised in Rhode Island. From her family, she’s learned the “passion and compassion” to help people with health issues, and to recognize cultural trends. For example, says Traub, in the immigrant community, she often sees confusion and lack of knowledge regarding diseases and disease prevention, proper use of medication and general lack of knowledge regarding health issues.

At home growing up, Traub says her mom stressed fresh fruit and vegetables and exercise, but many other families don’t get the same knowledge. She envisions community programs like partnerships between Johnson & Wales and area African restaurants, where community members can learn how to cook more nutritious meals with healthy substitutions such as olive oil instead of palm oil, which is the more common yet unhealthier ingredient within many traditional recipes. And with more than 75,000 Africans living in Rhode Island, she feels the interest is there.

She also now has first-hand evidence to back up her belief. Recently Traub worked with African Alliance of Rhode Island (and me) on a series of focus groups designed to understand how Africans perceive health issues. “What surprised me about the focus groups is that people were so interested in health,” but still bothered that “they didn’t know how or where to go. It kind of broke my heart,” laments Traub. Yet Traub says the confusion comes from lack of knowledge.

“And we can change that,” she concludes.
brandie Ard, DDS is one of the few, young black female dentists in Rhode Island. Though not originally from the Ocean State, Dr. Ard has recently poured her heart and soul into work at Blackstone Valley Community Health Care (BVCHC) Dental Clinic, servicing the underserved families in the Pawtucket and Central Falls areas.

Dr. Ard describes working at BVCHC Dental Clinic as giving her a sense of pride. Beyond being able to serve the patients that the clinic caters to, Dr. Ard has met other dentists through her co-workers, and has become a part of the Rhode Island Dental Association. As part of maintaining an active license, Dr. Ard also continues to get continuing education credit.

Only 28 years old and originally from Louisiana, Ard made her way to Rhode Island via a National Health Service Corps (NHSC) scholarship she earned while in dental school. To support her studies at Meharry Medical College, School of Dentistry, Dr. Ard was selected for the Dental Clinic in Pawtucket and Central Falls areas.

Dr. Ard interviewed at three other places before deciding to work with the Dental Clinic. She says she can’t help but notice, “as Black people, we do not go as often as we should to the dentist.” While many may choose to ignore a simple toothache or another simple oral health concern for fear of the fees, the longer anyone waits when they have a problem “the worse it can become,” and the more a family will have to pay in the long run for not treating the initial signs of pain, says Dr. Ard. “Maintenance and prevention are very important,” and in the long-term, “less costly.”

Many patients will either try to seek other services or will stop going to the dentist altogether. However, a lot of the patients that Dr. Ard sees are self-paying and don’t have insurance; with the sliding fee that the clinic has, many end up only paying $10 for a checkup.

Unfortunately, remarked Dr. Ard, the declining economy has affected BVCHC like other businesses statewide, causing serious budget cuts and the elimination of certain services. Moreover, with the money the clinic does receive, they have to determine where to allocate their funds based on greatest need.

But cutbacks also affect whether people choose to receive services. For example, says Dr. Ard, a lot of people who need the dental work cannot afford to pay even though the clinic offers a sliding fee scale. She sees this in the context of a larger problem, with lots of places no longer accepting government healthcare like Medicaid.

Oral hygiene at home is also a part of taking care of your mouth. Going to the dentist is only one part of it. Of course watch what you eat and make sure to brush and floss twice a day, use mouthwash when feasible, and be mindful of giving kids too much sugar, like soda, sugar pops, etc. All of these tips will help protect your teeth and preserve your oral health, while too much sugar can lead to dental problems.

While sensitive to today’s financial realities, Dr. Ard recommends that everyone “save money” for their “regular six-month cleaning” and check up. And true to the phrase “practice what you preach,” Dr. Ard goes for her own dental visits regularly.

Dr. Ard says she also makes sure to floss on a regular basis and is “constantly” looking in her own mouth “because of what I see every day.” But it’s no wonder that Dr. Ard is determined to set a good example; she’s always known that she wanted to be a dentist, even as a child. Dr. Ard says she loved going to the dentist, particularly visiting with her office’s hygienist.

Nevertheless, she decided while in college that she was going to continue pursuing the higher degree and stuck with dentistry. Her decision led her to Meharry’s School of Dentistry in Nashville, Tennessee, and to one of the two dentistry schools at a historically black college or university (HBCU); the other school is located at Howard University. Dr. Ard credits this as one of the reasons she had many mentors, including professors that she could look up to and whose examples she could follow.

Dr. Ard has never regretted her decision to become a dentist, even after reflecting on her childhood hygienist as being “really, really nice.” She also loves working for underserved groups, explaining, “People are so much more appreciative in the public health setting.” She hopes to stay with the National Health Service Corp for another year, and says she can’t see herself working in a private office. On the other hand, Dr. Ard does admit that she has had some trouble adjusting to Rhode Island, and she may be looking ahead.

One of the things she finds “a little difficult” at times is being referred to by her patients as “the black dentist,” but in a derogatory manner. But Dr. Ard says she doesn’t allow it to take over the sense of pride she feels for what she does, because at the end of the day, she loves it. “My passion and love for the work I do outweighs being called the ‘black dentist.’”

Besides, “At the end of the day, I’m a damn good ‘black dentist!’”

from piggy banks to health education chronic giving with Lourdes Pichardo

by Reza Corinne Clifton

Hearing Lourdes Pichardo talk about her family is a lot like receiving a geography lesson on the Dominican Republic. First, Pichardo was born in Santiago – the second largest city in the Spanish-speaking Caribbean nation. The first largest city is the capital, Santo Domingo, where Pichardo spent some of her childhood. She lived for nine years in Tamboril, which is where her father is originally from, and her mother is from a city called Licey, where she also lived for 8 months.

Currently she lives and works in Rhode Island after a series of moves and transitions like those described above. Ask her to recount how the changes happen and you may find her teary and saddened or smiling and proud; it depends on where in the story she is. There is the time she was separated from her father and mother for more than a year as part of the family’s emigration to the United States, and the fact that Pichardo supported the process by keeping a piggy bank to go toward the move. There is the time she drove her friend for a job opportunity and was among those selected for the openings after returning as an adult to the Dominican Republic.

Then there is the year she and her husband moved back to the states in search of optimum treatment for a daughter then-recently diagnosed with Leukemia. In addition to the challenge of caring for a sick child, Pichardo’s choice also meant leaving behind her mother, who was sick with cancer.

Upon returning to the U.S., Pichardo began working in fields dedicated to community and social service. Early on she opened a home childcare business to follow her interests in early learning, while later she did programming with the Providence School Department, and for Rhode Island PBS. In the meantime, Pichardo’s brother, who lived in New Jersey, became diagnosed and very sick with diabetes. Two years after him, Pichardo was diagnosed too.

Pichardo used their diagnoses to jump-start her education on the topic of diabetes; she began by becoming a diabetes information resources education specialist with the Rhode Island Department of Health. Today, she shares her knowledge through the “Chronic Disease Self Management Workshop,” a model pioneered by Stanford University in California. As a bilingual master teacher in chronic diseases, she says, she facilitates workshops that bring together doctors and community members to discuss asthma, heart disease, arthritis and diabetes.

In Spanish the classes are called Tomando Control de Su Salud, which literally means ‘taking control of your health.’ It is just one of many areas she hopes to teach from her book of life lessons, no matter what the setting is.

learn to live healthier and feel better

Living Well Rhode Island Chronic Disease Self Management Workshops are highly participative. Mutual support and success build participants’ confidence in their ability to manage their health and maintain active and fulfilling lives. If you have asthma, diabetes, heart disease, cancer, arthritis or another chronic disease, this free workshop is for you. You will learn: how to manage your symptoms, how to communicate effectively with your doctor, how to lessen your frustration, how to fight fatigue, how to make daily tasks easier and how to get more out of life. Workshops are for anyone who has one or more chronic conditions. A friend, caregiver or relative is welcome to attend with you. Workshops are offered in Spanish and English. Registration and workshops are ongoing. Check the schedule and location of workshops by calling 222-7623.

let’s talk equity dialogue
Minority Health Advisory Committee holds annual meeting

Over 100 people attended the Minority Health Advisory Committee Annual Meeting on February 12 at the Rhode Island Department of Administration. The meeting was the first in a series of equity dialogues planned for 2010. Included in the presentation was the committee’s 2010 priorities, the new Health Equity Framework and data from the updated Minority Health Fact Sheets. In raising awareness of health disparities, a call to action was made. Some in the audience suggested more efforts need to be done for the community to understand what they can do on a local level.

In Rhode Island, 20% of the population is a racial/ethnic minority. The Minority Health Advisory Committee’s priorities for 2010 include: 1) Promote health equity and continue to integrate elimination of racial and ethnic health disparities across all Health programs by providing information, education and training to Rhode Island communities on health indicators, health outcomes, and social determinants of health. 2) Continue supporting the implementation of the CLAS Standards in health care settings across Rhode Island. 3) Promote the translation of research into practice to help Health and partners stay focused on health equity.

jumping into public health outreach experience with nriAHEC

by Elizabeth Guillen

My internship at the Northern Rhode Island Area Health Center (nriAHEC) first began in the summer of 2007. At the time, I was enrolled in a youth summer program at Family Resources, an organization in Woonsocket whose work includes developing six-week internships designed to expose youth to different careers. I was very nervous at first because most of my other friends were going on group internships, and I was going to be placed at the nriAHEC office on my own. Today, I am glad that I decided to take initiative and follow through with the internship.

Initially, I was unclear about the purpose of nriAHEC’s work. On day one, seeing that I was visibly anxious, Yvette Mendez, the executive director, greeted me with a warm smile and assured me that everything would be fine. As the days went on, I continued my outreach experience with nriAHEC

As I said my final goodbye’s after that first summer, I remember feeling sad; I didn’t want it to end. I had acquired many new skills during my short internship and had met many new faces. Little did I know that a couple months later, I would get an e-mail from Mendez asking me to return.

Thrilled when I received it, I accepted the offer. Since then, I have been coming back periodically to nriAHEC for additional internships. There is always something to do at nriAHEC, and never a dull day.

Because it is a small office with lots of responsibilities, each time I intern at nriAHEC, I am exposed to a growing network of contacts. Yet not only is it a variety of people that I am exposed to, but different careers and opportunities too. Take a project I ran in the summer of 2009.

At the time, I worked on a project called ‘Safe Teen’ that dealt with Teen Pregnancy and Sexually Transmitted Infections (STI’s), something of interest to me because researchers are noting that teen pregnancy rates are on the rise again for the first time in 15 years. Under Safe Teen, I surveyed teens and parents, all of whom, in the end, I found to be mostly honest and candid. One result of the survey showed that 99% of teens wish that they had better access to educational materials, and many felt like they could not speak to their parents about sex. I walked away from the project with the assertion and supporting evidence that sexual education for teens is something that needs to be addressed so that teen pregnancy and STI’s do not become an epidemic, and so that we can assure that all teens are safe.

Another project, which I finished more recently, addresses lead safety. What is the problem? Many houses built before 1978 have lead paint, and if the paint in these houses is not properly taken care of, it can pose significant health hazards. According to available research on the topic, one out of every eleven children in the U.S. has dangerous levels of lead in their bloodstream. The worse part is that many of these children do not have or appear with visible symptoms; therefore they don’t get treated until damage is done, often irreversible.

In response to lead safety needs in the Northern Rhode Island area, nriAHEC conducted outreach in collaboration with Thundermist Health Center. The objective was to inform the population on the dangers of lead poisoning—through workshops, door-to-door campaigns and information tables in community settings. Many families have been reached.

As I learned through my research and outreach with nriAHEC and Thundermist, lead poisoning is, sadly, one of many issues currently affecting low-income earners and communities of color. It is very important to get the information out there to everyone, and to ensure access for everyone.

For me, having the experience with nriAHEC has given me access to my options and to resources that allow me to better analyze my future career plans. I am still not sure what I will pursue when I am done with college. However, I do know that I want to do something in Public Health, and I know that I have the experience to support it.

Do you? If not, step right up, take the jump, and join nriAHEC.

listen to your body, optimize your health

by Yvonne Heredia

Health care providers educate and give advice to others on how to best manage health conditions as well as staying healthy. However, it is no secret that many of them don’t take their own advice about staying healthy and seeking professional health care when it is needed. Many times we find excuses such as being too busy, too tired or just afraid of what will result from following up on subtle symptoms. The caveat is that we need to follow our own advice and take better care of ourselves.

This past year I neglected my health using the excuse of being too busy and found myself with health issues that have long term consequences, even after contributing to the 2009 Minority Health edition of She Shines. If only I listened and followed the advice that I give others.

At the time I was working long hours at work. Then when I would go home, I would spend hours every night studying for my doctorate degree in Public Health. There were signs and symptoms that my body was telling me to pay attention to, but I ignored them all. I now know from personal experience how important it is to listen to our bodies, especially because some conditions can be prevented.

Below are helpful tips for staying healthy that can be utilized by everyone, including health professionals.

1. Make time to see your provider.
2. Listen to your body when it’s trying to tell you something or when you notice symptoms.
3. Get adequate rest every night.
4. Take time off when you need it. Use sick time or personal time if you have it and explore medical leave options if you need it.
5. Overall, put yourself first.

Nothing is more important than caring for you because if you don’t place you first, you cannot be of assistance to others. Today, I’m back at work after taking medical leave to address my issues.

health equity and the Urban League of Rhode Island

by Michelle Wilson

HIV/AIDS, obesity, cardiovascular disease and diabetes. These are just a few of the many preventable diseases that have historically and disproportionately claimed the lives of African Americans and people of color, and highlighted the existence of health disparities based on race and income.

In recent years, the discussion on ending these disparities and reaching health equity has come to the forefront as state and federal agencies and health advocates tackle the differences highlighted above as well as issues of health reform and how to improve overall health outcomes for the nation’s most vulnerable populations. But they are not the first.

As director of community services for the Urban League of Rhode Island (ULRI), I am honored to continue the agency’s legacy of advancing health equity for at-risk populations living in the city of Providence and throughout Rhode Island. That is because since our founding in 1939, ULRI has maintained a strong presence in addressing many of the major health concerns found among communities of color and priority populations.

Programs have focused on such issues as nutrition, injury and violence prevention, diet and exercise, cancer, stress management and diabetes, to name a few. We’ve also looked at more recent topics.

Dating as far back as 1997, ULRI joined in the fight against HIV/AIDS when the agency received funding from the Rhode Island Department of Health (HEALTH) to provide high-risk women with prevention education workshops. With help from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), ULRI, since 2000, has been able to expand its program to include access to high-risk individuals involved with the state’s judicial and correctional facilities.

Also for almost a decade, the agency’s Tobacco Control Program has remained diligent in bringing awareness to African American and low income populations about the harmful effects of tobacco, secondhand smoke and tobacco by-products. Most recently, ULRI was a partner agency in the collection of data for a program that looked at “Geographical Information Systems” (GIS) mapping, which focuses on finding trends by location. Results of the project revealed tremendous disparities in the sale of these deadly products since GIS mapping allowed researchers to see disproportionately higher rates of advertising and promotion of cigarettes in low income, urban neighborhoods as compared to higher income, suburban communities. There was also evidence of strategies and product placement that targeted all youth.

Along with other tobacco coalition partners, ULRI has used these findings to advocate for stronger legislative oversight of tobacco sales, restrictions on predatory advertising, and other important policy-changes. And as the discussion on the elimination of racial and health disparities advances, ULRI will continue to be front and center.

Currently, for example, ULRI is one of several agencies funded by a Preventive Health and Health Services Block Grant through HEALTH and the CDC – a special program designed to improve health in communities of color. Joining a number of community organizations in this campaign, our agency efforts have focused on engaging the community in the federal and state’s new, broader focus on reaching health equity and examining social determinants of health. Studying social determinants is based on looking at whether or not groups have access to quality education, safe housing and neighborhoods, and career opportunities, or looking at where individuals live, work and play.

Funding under the Preventive Health grant also led to the founding of ULRI’s new blog, UrbanHealthWatch.net, which was created to advance health literacy, promote culturally appropriate health messaging and engage in two-way communication with the community on persistent and emerging health issues and topics. The feedback we receive will allow for a more comprehensive understanding of the community’s interests and needs, as well as help key stakeholders develop directly responsive action plans and programs – as defined by diverse populations.

After all, it is predicted that by 2045, more than half of the population in the U.S. will be persons-of-color. My role as director of community services and the mission of ULRI will be to continue to develop effective programs and services to improve health outcomes for these future generations, and all Rhode Islanders in general.

For more information on the Urban League of Rhode Island, visit www.ulri.org or call 351-5000. To follow the agency’s new health blog, Urban Health Watch, visit www.UrbanHealthWatch.net.
more joy for women and children
Rhode Island KIDS COUNT on Early Head Start
by Elizabeth Burke Bryant

Pregnancy and the birth of a child are both joyful and stressful times as parents adjust to new roles and a new way of interacting as a family. In terms of stressors, new responsibilities place increased economic, social and emotional demands on mothers and fathers. All families need a positive and supportive network of relationships around them as they make the transition to parenthood.

Yet for many women, pregnancy and parenthood are challenging times filled with anxiety over health issues or lack of economic resources. Some women do not have a network of friends, neighbors and family members to rely on for guidance, help and advice. It is these families that benefit most from Early Head Start, a “two-generation” program with services provided for parents and children.

Established in 1994, Early Head Start is a comprehensive early childhood program serving low-income families during pregnancy and through the child’s third birthday. Early Head Start promotes healthy births for pregnant women, fosters healthy family relationships, helps women and their families with education and jobs, and connects families to high-quality early learning programs and other needed services.

Early Head Start is a program that has been proven to make a difference in the lives of families with infants and toddlers. For example, children who participate in Early Head Start have significant gains in cognitive and language development, while parents have been found to have more positive interactions with their babies and toddlers. Early Head Start parents also provide greater opportunities for language and learning to their children — as compared to parents not participating in Early Head Start. Especially important to those working with teen parents is that mothers who participate have fewer subsequent births within two years of enrollment, and they are more likely to participate in education and job-training activities.

There are six Early Head Start programs in Rhode Island serving almost 400 families, but more will receive help soon. Thanks to investments that were part of the President’s American Recovery and Reinvestment Act (ARRA), Rhode Island will receive federal funds to serve 134 additional families.

More families served, more moments of joy.

Elizabeth Burke Bryant is the executive director of Rhode Island KIDS COUNT. This statewide children’s policy organization works to improve and ensure the economic well-being, health, safety, education and development of Rhode Island children. Early Head Start is one of over 60 issues covered in the annual Rhode Island KIDS COUNT Factbook available at www.rikidscount.org. Early Head Start Programs in Rhode Island: CHILD, Inc. Children’s Friend; Comprehensive Community Action Program; East Bay Community Action; and Meeting Street TriTown Economic Opportunity Committee.
They beam like kids in a candy store as they survey the array of stethoscopes and medical equipment, which crowd the tabletops in the cluttered classroom. It’s clear that they delight in knowing they will learn to use this equipment and that they imagine themselves as nurses and Certified Nursing Assistants (CNAs) – rushing about to help the frail, the sick and the needy. The tools allow them to see themselves in a place where they’ll be respected, valued and highly skilled.

They brighten in those transcendent moments, and when they speak of their children; of coming to America; and of learning English. Led by a dream or journey they each hold dear, these are adult students participating in a program designed to improve literacy and occupational skills – in route to a career in healthcare. They represent many countries, a wide range of ages and an even wider range of maturity and experience. Yet, they come together in support of each other and their respective hopes to make a difference in the lives of those in need, their own families and assuredly, themselves.

In Rhode Island, there are many traditional opportunities to catch the speed rail to a healthcare occupation. For the traditional student, the train leaves the station in first grade and travels uninterrupted through the last depot stop – college and/or graduate school. There, the lucky traveler picks up their shiny diploma or license in medicine, dentistry, nursing, radiology, physical therapy, nurse practitioner, physician’s assistant, etc. He or she then gets a job, picks up an SUV and buys a house in the suburbs. He or she will then pass the traditional type of educational and occupational route highlighted above. They also include supports to help alleviate roadblocks that occur because of childcare, transportation and domestic violence issues.

Emerging among the nine career areas was healthcare and, soon after, the question of how to support individuals who longed to enter the field. After all, from advanced levels of math and science, to long qualifying tests that must be taken in English and/or performed in view of others, the stringent requirements and academic sophistication needed for a number of positions in medicine are well-known and out of reach for many.

To respond to the Workforce Board’s inclusion of the healthcare industry, and in acknowledgment of the diverse backgrounds of those interested in the field, Quality Partners of Rhode Island created the course FUNdamentals of Healthcare. The aim was to respond to the need for more “contextualized curriculum” for those at “lower ranges of the educational spectrum,” by coupling literacy skill-building with topics required for early entry into healthcare. As is the case for a sizable slice of community, for adults who read at or between the fourth and sixth grade level, finding a job can be difficult.

When asked why she decided to study the “FUNdamentals,” Rocio Alvarez, a woman whose homeland is Mexico, softens and says, “I have always dreamed to be a CNA.” It’s because, she says, “I want to make a difference!” Her eyes then glister even further as she asks if she can share a story with the class; it’s a group assembled for a pre-CNA program through the Career Center at Dorcas Place, an agency focused on adult learning opportunities for low-income Rhode Islanders. Encouraged by her instructor (and my colleague), Sue Midwood, Alvarez begins, negotiating and at times, stumbling through her English: “My brother has cancer and is very sick,” she tells them in a tears expression of concern. She goes on to reference a lesson from the day before that dealt with materials and techniques used for tending to a specific medical condition.

“I want you to know that I was able to help my brother,” Alvarez goes on to say, explaining her familiarity with instructions for her brother’s care. It was because the doctor prescribed the same tools and applications they had just learned through their curriculum, a comprehensive guide that also includes lessons on English-language development, public speaking and fieldtrips. “I made a difference in another person’s life and that is what I have been praying [for] day after day,” says Alvarez, “a way to make a difference and now I have found that way! My dream has come true!” Pausing very briefly, she quickly adds, “And so can yours!” The beautiful and expressive middle-aged woman then rejoins the class, which, in unison, appears to sit in astonished silence.

The Rocio Alvaraez’s of the world are poised and ready to bring their warm loving hearts and their skilled and caring hands to the world of healthcare. Ensuring the availability of non-traditional pathways and alternative career ladders to healthcare jobs for her and her small army – it simply cannot happen quickly enough!

Sights and Sounds for the She Spirit

for music, health and Haiti

by Shevon Young

I normally do not watch television, but I happened to catch the news one day – a devastating earthquake had just struck Haiti. Immediately heartbroken when I saw all the damage and destruction it caused, an overwhelming sensation of needing to act came over me.

The question, what could I do? I’m no CEO or state department head. My name is Shevon Youn, I am twenty-nine years old, and the mother of four children. Born and raised in Providence, my feet had never touched down in the island nation. But I am a member of a local music group that calls itself SlyShuga, and I had a sense that the answer was there.

SlyShuga mixes Spoken Word Poetry, Hip Hop, R&B and Jazz. We began working with other artists through a concept we called “G.E.T. In Here Thursdays.” G.E.T., which stands for Great Eclectic Talent, allowed us to build relationships with other area businesses and organizations. It was from this network of artists and community members that the answer to my Haiti question would emerge, Rise as One: A Benefit Concert for Haiti.

The network continued expanding. With the response to initial requests for artists and volunteers being immediate and undeniable, we decided to seek fiscal sponsors and solidified partnerships with two locally-run charities to ensure our efforts would directly reach the citizens of Haiti: La Providence a local Haitian organization and His Home for Children orphanage in Haiti.

On February 20, at Rosinhas Restaurant and Bar in Pawtucket, the R.A.1 concert took place, and it was a success. Dozens of vocalists, bands and other performers donated their time, joining the cash and in-kind donations given by the roomful of attendees. Immediately afterward we purchased formula, peanut butter, tuna fish and waterproof tents – items that will help to keep children a little more healthy. On March 3, these items were all shipped.

As I reflect, it’s hard not to think of the whole group. I think because all of the women on the R.A.1 team were mothers, it was important to us to reach out to the children of Haiti. I encourage other mothers and women to also get involved.

Statistics and a predisposition for eye disease are two big reasons minorities must take an active role in their eye health. Latino and African American eye health minority groups have among the highest rates of visual impairment and eye disease such as glaucoma and diabetic retinopathy. In fact, glaucoma is 4 to 5 times more prevalent in African Americans than Caucasians and 75 percent of Latinos currently living with glaucoma and ocular hypertension are unaware of their disease.

Blindness affects African Americans more frequently than Latinos and Caucasians; and Latinos, due to poor eye health education and a genetic predisposition for eye disease, have higher rates of visual impairment than any race or ethnicity.

Many eye diseases are preventable and often times if caught in time vision loss can be reversed or minimized. The later an eye problem is diagnosed, the harder it becomes to treat. This April, in honor of Minority Health Awareness Month, we urge everyone and in particular minorities to evaluate their eye health.

Williams is developing a book on breast health, “It has been a journey. . . . My hope was that a mother would sit down with her young daughter and show her this book and talk to her about breasts. Talk to her about self examination and breast cancer. Talk to her about her body. That was my hope and my intention, but what I am finding is the younger women are teaching older women how to let go.”

I hear you are working on a book. “One time I was doing a training with some young folks on self esteem . . . I put up some posters around the room with different body parts and [asked them] to list the names that they have heard those parts called. When they got to breasts, we needed another piece of paper . . . Then a friend of mine found out that her sister had breast cancer. Her sister was diagnosed and passed away within a year. It hit me . . . create this book [entitled ‘The Girls’] . . . every woman has a breast story. Take some pictures and put this compilation together . . . Help women feel empowered not only about their bodies, but also about choices. When you feel good about yourself, you make healthier and better choices.”

You are a minister? “A licensed minister is really someone who just ministers to people freely . . . I do women’s healing services in the community.” “Reaching out to the homeless and those underserved. I like to look at my life as this. I’ve been a minister all my life, I just got my license in the last seven years . . . I have always worked with women in some way shape or form to educate . . . So formally my jobs have been in domestic violence, HIV/AIDS, substance abuse, homeless, teen runaways . . . but informally in my community and in my ministry I have done that . . . I can ride the city bus and end up ministering to someone who is homeless and end up finding them a shelter to stay that night. So it’s always been my life . . . what I feel I’ve been called to do.”

Currently you are working at Housing Action Coalition? “I think it was my turn to learn about how to get people in safe, affordable housing.”

Williams is director of outreach and engagement.

What is behind the drive in these community efforts? “I would like every woman to feel the way I feel about life . . . You know they [her grandma and mother] spent quality time nurturing and loving me and so I’ve always felt powerful and loved and capable of doing anything. Then as I grew up, friends and neighbors I’ve been around didn’t always feel that way. It saddens me. I want to give women that gift . . . of loving herself or changing her mind about an unhealthy thing that she was thinking about. Making sure she’s safe. Getting her some food. Putting her on the right track to get a job. If I can give anything that changes a women’s life for the better, that’s what makes it worthwhile . . . I want to give back, cause I think we’re wonderful and I don’t think we know it.”

You gave the keynote address for the Parenting in Progress Graduation and Awards Ceremony. What is your connection with YWCA? “They [teen mothers] gave me such joy . . . I just love the YWCA. I believe in its mission. I believe that it is a wonderful empowering place for women and young girls, especially because they provide things that break down barriers . . . It’s a place that women can go and get what they need and feel safe . . . They grow there.”

What factors influence health outcomes? “There are a lot of health disparities and barriers to accessing care, especially for women and especially for minority women. So when you think about breaking down those barriers, I think education is most important . . . you want to make sure you are educating folks about different cultures, about different needs and values . . . We need to educate not just the people who are accessing these services, but we need to educate the providers of these services and those who are funding those providers . . . The benefits are great when we do that . . . The impact is on a community.”

Will you share a personal health story? “I work so much with clients in helping them to access services and advocating for them, that I was not advocating for myself . . . its a lesson learned.” “I got diagnosed with fibromyalgia over seven years ago. Before then, I was having so many problems and didn’t understand why . . . Not until two years ago did I find a doctor . . . I feel like finally I am in good hands and on my way to better health.”

Tell me about your youth? “I’m from Baltimore, Maryland. It is where my roots are.” “I had wonderful strong women who poured into me, so I was always able to feel beautiful, always feel strong and knew that I could conquer this world.” “Rhode Island is my home . . . when we moved [at age nine], my mother made sure that her [two] daughters were safe and that we got a good education . . . I always knew the expectation in my family was education and what was most important to me was to please my family.”

What have you discovered in your life experience? “Follow your heart . . . I went to school for teaching. Although I feel like teaching is a part of ministry, I like what I’ve learned in the world more than what I’ve learned in school. I think nothing prepares you for the stories that you hear from folks and for what women will trust you with.”

Do you have a message for young women? “I know it is hard, but find someone, another woman who you can trust and learn from. Hold onto her and value her and let her hold onto you and value you. I think that’s what we need to do for each other . . . and if you can’t find anybody, then find me.”

HEALTH

MINORITY HEALTH PROMOTION CENTER
YWCA Northern Rhode Island has been designated as a Minority Health Promotion Center by the Rhode Island Department of Health. It is the only organization in northern Rhode Island to receive such a designation. Our Association develops and implements health promotion, health education and risk reduction activities that improve the quality of life and eliminate health disparities for Woonsocket’s racial and ethnic populations. Call the YWCA Health Office for more information, 769-7450.

CHRONIC DISEASE

SELF MANAGEMENT WORKSHOP
If you have asthma, diabetes, heart disease, cancer, arthritis or another chronic disease, this FREE workshop is for you. You will learn: how to manage your symptoms, how to communicate effectively with your doctor, how to lessen your frustration, how to fight fatigue, how to make daily tasks easier and how to get more out of life. The workshop is for anyone who has one or more chronic conditions. A friend, caregiver or relative is welcome to attend with you. You will benefit from the problem-solving skills related to managing a chronic condition. Call for information on Living Well Rhode Island, Lisa Piscatelli at 769-7450.

BREAST CANCER INFORMATION

The Love/Avon Army of Women provides women the life-changing opportunity to partner with the scientists who are conducting the research that will move us beyond a cure and teach us how to end breast cancer once and for all. Sign up at www.armyofwomen.org.

SMOKING CESSATION

Supportive/educational one hour meeting weekly for 8 weeks held in northern Rhode Island area. Call the YWCA Health Office to register, 769-7450.

ENCOREplus®

ENCOREplus® is a systematic approach to women’s health promotion, in particular, breast and cervical cancer education. The YWCA offers community outreach, breast and cervical health education, linkage to clinical screening services and assistance in accessing and navigating diagnostic treatment services when necessary. The YWCA also offers support during diagnosis and treatment. If you are over age 40 and have no health insurance or your insurance does not cover breast and cervical screenings every year, you may qualify for FREE services. The Rhode Island Department of Health Women’s Cancer Screening Program provides a woman’s health exam including clinical breast and pelvic exams, pap smear, mammogram and follow-up services (a repeat mammogram, pap smear, breast ultrasound, colposcopy and biopsy).

For more details call Joyce Dolbec, YWCA Health Consultant, at 769-7450. If hearing/speech impaired call 1-800-745-5555.

Stand Against Racism.
Call YWCA Northern Rhode Island for participation details, 769-7450.
we’re making a difference

Established 1923
The year 2009 proved to be a successful one for YWCA Northern Rhode Island. Our early childhood development and after school programs grew by leaps and bounds; adult programming was expanded; and we obtained substantial grant funding to provide health outreach services to underinsured and uninsured members of our community. We also took on a leadership role in a statewide initiative to prevent teen pregnancy and support young families through our involvement with the Rhode Island Teen Pregnancy Coalition.

Our efforts to offer programs and services to eliminate racism and empower women did not go unnoticed. YWCA Northern Rhode Island’s She Shines Magazine was awarded the prestigious Metcalf Award for diversity in media. Our youth enrichment summer camp program is now among a select group of camps in Rhode Island accredited by the American Camp Association. And we received recognition for our community health outreach efforts from Quality Health Partners of Rhode Island, a nationally recognized leader in healthcare quality improvement.

Thanks to the hard work and dedication of the YWCA board of directors, team members and general membership, our reputation as The Association which works to eliminate racism and empower women, continues to grow.

Very truly yours,

Kim Garneau, President
YWCA Northern Rhode Island

YWCA Northern Rhode Island, a nonprofit organization, was established in 1923 and has been providing programs and services to the northern Rhode Island and surrounding Massachusetts communities for over 86 years.

Strengthened by diversity, the Association draws together members who strive to create opportunities for women’s growth, leadership and power in order to attain a common vision: peace, justice, freedom and dignity for all. Our goal is to eliminate racism and to empower women. We serve 20,000 people annually and are housed in an 18,000 square foot building located on 4.2 acres of land in the north end of the City of Woonsocket.

Our annual operating budget is 1.2 million. Fiscal year 2009 income was generated from program fees, state reimbursements for childcare, grants, corporate sponsorship and membership generosity.

An executive director, finance director, communications director, physical education director, early childhood development director, youth enrichment coordinator and a parenting coordinator provide administrative support to our organization. In addition to our core staff, there are over 40 part-time employees who work at our facility during the course of the year. Fourteen women currently serve on our board of directors. Over 75 individuals volunteer during the course of the year. Our staff and board members are culturally and linguistically diverse and reflect the makeup of the community we serve.
In 1923, Woonsocket caused a national uproar. That year, YWCA Northern Rhode Island defied tradition and voted to open its doors to women of all religious denominations.

The action was stunning - appalling to some - because since the organization’s founding in England in 1855, YWCA membership had been restricted solely to women of Evangelical Protestant faith.

Although the open policy generated controversy for some time, three years later the national YWCA followed suit and admitted the Woonsocket YWCA to membership.

YWCA Northern Rhode Island was founded in 1923 under a $60,000 grant willed by Dency Wilbur (1840-1919), a physician of the Quaker faith, who recognized the needs of young women. Its first president was Mrs. Samuel E. Hudson, whose husband was publisher of The Woonsocket Call.

The YWCA has always been located in Woonsocket, first on Federal Street and because of the facilities and activities it offered, it was deemed an instant success. The building was small, however, and gradual development forced the YWCA to move. Federal Street and move into a three story structure located at 380 Blackstone Street. Growing out of that space the YWCA built a new facility in 1967 and moved to our present location, 514 Blackstone Street.
hallmark programs

our mission

YWCA Northern Rhode Island is dedicated to eliminating racism, empowering women and promoting peace, justice, freedom and dignity for all.

Hallmark Priorities:
Racial Justice
Women’s Economic Advancement

There are many approaches employed by YWCAs nationwide to carry out our bold, dual-pronged mission of eliminating racism and empowering women, but two very specific priorities are present in all local Associations: our YWCA Hallmarks of Racial Justice and Women’s Economic Advancement. These are the common threads that unite YWCAs across the country, they reflect our strategic purpose, and they serve as a YWCA distinction.

YWCA Hallmark initiatives are designed to have a direct and measurable impact throughout the YWCA and are often complimented by the YWCA's daily programs and services.
Through community advocacy, collaborations and strategic planning, YWCA Northern Rhode Island brings into view the ways in which jobs, working conditions, education, housing, social inclusion and even political power influence individual and community health. Emphasis is placed on how societal resources are distributed unequally by class and by race, and how that affects one’s health.

YWCA Northern Rhode Island 2009 health equity efforts include:

- Culturally and linguistically appropriate programming focusing on health literacy, nutrition and obesity prevention, tobacco cessation, heart health, breast and cervical health, management of chronic diseases, self-advocacy, connecting people to services and community building. (This effort received recognition as an outstanding community based program from Quality Health Partners of Rhode Island, a nationally recognized leader in health care quality improvement.)

- Dedication of an edition of She Shines magazine to the topic minority health. (This effort has resulted in our association receiving the prestigious Metcalf Award for diversity in journalism. These awards are presented by Rhode Island for Community and Justice, a nationally recognized leader in health care quality improvement.)

- Rhode Island Department of Health designated “Minority Health Promotion Center” which serves as a focal point for health education, information and risk reduction activities within the minority community.

- Compilation of a neighborhood needs assessment to assist in planning community-based initiatives, which address chronic disease and health disparities in Woonsocket’s Constitution Hill/Fairmount neighborhood.

- Workshop presenter, 6th New England Minority Health Conference. The mission of the New England Minority Health Conference is to create a dynamic forum to develop strategies to eliminate racial and ethnic health disparities.

YWCA Northern Rhode Island also offers general programs and events, through collaborative partnerships, which bring awareness to racial justice and promotes equity throughout our community. Our 2009 programs include:

- Funda Fest: A celebration of Black storytelling hosted by YWCA Northern Rhode Island. A program of Rhode Island Black Storytellers, Funda means to teach and to learn in the African languages Zulu and Kiswahili.

- Unnatural Causes: YWCA Northern Rhode Island community conversation series utilizing the award winning documentary Unnatural Causes to explore America’s racial and socioeconomic inequities in health.
YWCA Northern Rhode Island  We’re Making A Difference

women’s economic advancement

Through YWCA economic advancement programs, women are able to transform their lives by participating in a variety of educational programs and services that focus on new beginnings, employment training and career opportunities.

The YWCA is committed to helping women of all ages and backgrounds achieve long-term social and financial security. YWCA Northern Rhode Island 2009 programs which help women succeed in life and in the world of work include:

- Young Voices: Preparing young women for the world of work, advocacy and self-reliance.
- PIP-RITA: A Pathway to Success for Teen Mothers and Their Children.
- Summer Growth: Opportunities for traditional female high school students who have missed class due to pregnancy and/or childbirth to recapture academic credits necessary for high school graduation.
- Girls in Non-Traditional Trades: Annual women’s organization partnership event that invites middle and high school girls to explore careers in non-traditional trades such as carpenters, electricians, bricklayers through hands on experience.
- Women’s Political Empowerment: Workshops and events that encourage women to become involved in the political process and position themselves to advocate on behalf of women.
- Golf League: Teaching women how to network through the game of golf.
- Girls Gymnastics Academy: Teaching necessary leadership skills to succeed in the world of work including team building, discipline, self-confidence, completion and leadership. Many young women graduate from the academy and become YWCA gymnastic instructors.
- Job search preparation: Assistance finding the right job, resume writing and interview skill preparation.
- Computer Literacy: Basic computer skills and literacy.
- She Shines magazine: An on-line and direct mail publication which celebrates the aspirations and accomplishments of women, offers female business owners opportunity to self-promote and is a resource for economic advancement.
- Support services for working women: Childcare for children 6 weeks to age 5, afterschool care for children grade K-7, physical fitness classes, health information and resources, and personal development workshops and classes.
Women Holding Office, a rally call for women to come together, support one another and become part of the political process.

More than 130 women including 27 Rhode Island female leaders (Democrats, independents, a Republican, town office holders, a tribal council member, state representatives and the lieutenant governor) gathered at Kirkbrae Country Club in Lincoln for the YWCA Women Holding Office event.

The keynote speaker Victoria A. Budson, founder and executive director of the Women and Public Policy Program at the Harvard Kennedy School, called on all those present to seek elected office or support others who do so, and cited the research of former Brown University political science professor Jennifer Lawless, which Budson said shows that when women run, they are elected as often as men. Budson emphasized that women should seek office not simply because of equality, but because of the bread-and-butter issues they prioritize that appeal to female as well as male voters.

Lt. Governor Elizabeth Roberts, the state's top-ranking female elected official, also spoke and underscored the need for more women to become involved in the political process in Rhode Island.

Event partners were the League of Women Voters of Rhode Island, Center for Women & Enterprise, and the Rhode Island Commission on Women.
The 5th Annual YWCA Northern Rhode Island Women of Achievement Awards, which publicly honor the efforts of women who have helped to improve the lives of women, girls and people of color, provided opportunity for 14 women to share their accomplishments and triumphs during a luncheon event.

The 2009 Women of Achievement award winners include:
- Clarice L. Thompson, music educator and composer; artist in residence at the Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra & Music School;
- Shanna Wells, director, Rhode Island Commission on Women;
- Margaret “Digit” Murphy, Brown University women’s head hockey coach;
- State Representative Donna M. Walsh, D-Charlestown;
- Lisa Bergeron, motivational speaker and president of Leading Women SENE;
- Yvonne Freeman, medical management team leader, Neighborhood Health Plan of Rhode Island;
- Paige Clausius-Parks, advisor and teacher at the Met Center;
- Kathleen A. Taylor, co-chairwoman for Healthy Families Initiative at the Rhode Island Council for Muslim Advancement;
- Nancy Rafi, executive director of the Rhode Island Crisis Center;
- Ana Giron, director of victim services for the Department of Attorney General;
- Tracy C. Baran, counselor-at-law at Partridge Snow & Hahn LLP; board member for the R.I. Women’s Bar Association;
- Mary-Kim Arnold, executive director of the Rhode Island Council for the Humanities;
- Valerie Tutson, executive director of the Rhode Island Black Storytellers; and
- Karen Feldman, co-director of Young Voices.
spotlight
supporting young families and reducing the rates of teen pregnancy

Core to our mission, YWCA Northern Rhode Island leads community efforts and programs to reduce the rates of teen pregnancy, and encourage teen mothers to develop the knowledge, interest and confidence to pursue whatever profession they choose.

Through programs such as YWCA Northern Rhode Island’s Parenting in Progress, teen mothers and their children are provided a community-wide continuum of care beginning with learning the basic skills of how to care and provide for a child, obtaining public services as required, education advancement, and connecting with employers to provide an opportunity for higher wages, better benefits and a better life for themselves, their children and future generations. Forty-three women benefitted from our program during the traditional academic school year, an additional 20 women attended summer programming.

As fiscal agent for Rhode Island Teen Pregnancy Coalition, and with support from the Rhode Island Foundation, YWCA Northern Rhode Island is taking the leadership role in creating a statewide comprehensive plan for teen pregnancy prevention. The mission of the 41 member coalition is to reduce rates of unwanted pregnancy among teens in Rhode Island and to support pregnant and parenting teens and their children to optimize health and educational outcomes.
Parenting in Progress

Since 1984, YWCA Northern Rhode Island has offered the Parenting in Progress program as a comprehensive alternative education program in collaboration with various agencies.
